A WOMAN'S "NO."

From the Mec-a. From the Messa.

She was very charming, the little capital, call at 93 West 9th, room 14.

Counters Filine, which was admitted even by designing mammas with marriageable daughters at their disposal, who, in sumroing up the various imperfections of oththan their own in the matrimonial mart, were wont, owing to some utterly incomprehensible impulse, to pass by in belle Americaine without comment or critfelsm, save, perhaps, a faintly murmured Icism, save, perhaps, a faintly murmured WANTED—Tie-makers, for Arkansas; "Heu!" with eyes turned heavenward, men with tools furnished free pass; ship which might mean something or nothing dully. HOPKINS, 1916 Union ave. -one of those miserable immendes of so-ciety which, hit or miss, it matters not to the thoughtless or unprincipled directors of them.

A process of international barter, Amer-Ican gold for a foreign title, the little countess, a fascinating widow at 25, was engaged at the arduous though interesting task of deciding as to the respective merits of two aspirants for matrimonial honors.

based on her beauty and fortune.

Raoul, Count de —, a typical Frenchman, was charming, and, that said, his admirers were silent from necessity. The majority avowed that no other praise was necessary. That said, all was said, but the little countess was unreasonable enough to ask for something more.

the little counters was unreasonable enough to ask for something more.

The other suitor, Donald Stuart, as the count said, was "only an American, and," he was wont to add, "worse yet one of those newspaper fellows, who slows look hungry, mon Dieu! and talk about their 'dens."

But the countess did not seem to find this an objection—at least, an insurmountable one; at which the Frenchman, with a dark look in his handsome eyes, would murmur, with a discreetly veiled sneer:

"What a pity that madame le countess were not more aristocratic in her tastes!"

But he soon forgot this shortcoming in gazing into her eyes, which he likened to diamond stars set in onyx, so dark were the drooping lashes; or comparing her treeses, which were like burnished copper, to an amber net which would hold his poor heart forever.

an amber net which would hold his poor heart forever.

And what was Donald doing meanwhile — Donald, who was only a newspaper man, with a clear American brain, a loyal heart, and able, helpful hands; a man whom you would feel it an insult to associate with a dishonorable thought; and one who, in giving his heart to a woman, gave her an object worthy of her acceptance? And yet the countess had refused him. Why? It was doubtless if even she could tell you. A woman's caprice, which she knew at the time to be without the shadow of an excuse. Something had vexed her; and she, usually a sensible woman, had fancied, under the influence of that vexation, that the journalist was too confident in his avowal of love. There had been no abject prayer for her favor, such as the count uttered daily, and she happened to be in a mood to resent it, although at the same time her foolish little heart was bemoaning the possibility of having lost to be in a mood to resent it, although at the same time her foolish little heart was bemoaning the possibility of having lost him forever. Not that she admitted it even to herself, or allowed any tell-tale witnesses. Oh, no! For she was a woman; but the clever brain, heart-directed, went to work at once to repair the mischief done. She would recall him—not as a favor to herself, not at all, but as a very great boon to him. But how?

The countess had become a good Catholle; and her favorite priest at the confessional was a good old abbe, who took all young people and their love affairs into his big, affectionate heart, and gave them fatherly sympathy and advice. She would go to him that very afternoon—not to confess her folly, direct, but to give a hint of it, perhaps broad enough to lead the good father to some general observations and advice, which might serve for her direction. And an hour later the capricious little lady, soberly clad in black, and closely veiled, was on her way to the cathedral. It was not the usual hour for confession. But so much the better. The good priest was generally about; and at this time she could consult him with greater freedom. The church, dimly lighted by waxen tapers, seemed quite deserted, and she swiftly made her way toward the confessional where she was wont to receive absolution. Yes, a slight sound within convinced her that the abbe was in attendance, his portly form hidden from sight, as was the custom. And, evidently believing an honest confession as good for the heart as for the soul, la petite countess, after a preliminary presentation of various fancied sins both of commission and omission, discreetly broached the subject which was occupying her heart.

"You have wronged some one, you say, daughter?" said the low muffled voice of ing her heart.
"You have wronged some one, you say, daughter?" said the low, muffled voice of the priest. "The a grievous sin."

he priest. "Tis a grievous sin."
"True, father"
"And atonement must be made."
"I am ready, father."
"The nature of your offense? Tell me, aughter."

"A deception, reverend father."
"Deception? That is bad. And whom hast thou thus wronged—man or woman?"
"Man," came very faintly from the velled lips of the countess. "How must I atone for my fault?"
"Beneal, daughter, of the sin, and seek lips of the countess. "How must I atone for my fault?"

"Repent, daughter, of thy sin, and seek forgiveness of him whom thou has wronged. For the penitent there is absolution. But tell me further of thine offense. The heart is a snare, and oft doth counsel wrongly. Hast thou trilled with the affection of some good man, leading him to believe in a love which only was felgued?"
"Oh, no, father—quite the reverse. For I did deny the love which really existed."
Silence for a moment; and then it was no longer the priest, but the man who spoke.
"Fifine my singel! Forgive the deception. Our good abbe was called away an hour since, and, as I saw you hastening toward the confessional, I was tempted beyond myself to personate him to you for a few brief moments, hoping—nay, believing—that I should find you mine in spite of that cruel 'No,' Forgive me, sweetheart. Seetits I who come to you for absolution. Be true to your heart. Come to me. Be my wife."

A moment she hesitated, love struggling moment she hesitated, love struggling the love in her eyes quite velled up in the droughing lashes; but it would not stay hidden in her voice. "Two negatives ought to be sufficient," she whispered. "They are, sweetheart, for they mean 'yes,' Ah! let the lover who rebels at his lady's 'no' but make her say it twice, and he has won her. This, cherle, is a lover's philosophy, and the whole bewildering secret of a woman's 'no."
